THE EXILE'S PRAYER.

Boftly fell the twillight shadows Husked was every sound of day, Slowly from an Exile's bosom Ebbed his weary life away. Banished from his home and country, Far from human care or ken.

In a parched and dreary desert,

Short his pilgrimage had been. Reared midst luxury and comfort, Loved, caressed by friends not few, Full of hope this child of formus, Lived-and scarce a sorrow knew. Until the hour he dared to cherish Hope of winning Nita's hand.

His proud sovercion chafed and angry. Drove him to a distant land. Falls the sturdy forest tree,

When the tempest's power bath touched it, Just so blighted, wrecked, was he. Flowers tee, whose Mems lie broken. Tell us of the storm's Serce wrath, Drooping heads whose shattered petals, Meekly strew his abgry path.

So, the gentle heart of Nita, Striken by one sudden blast, Poured forth tears of bitter anguish, Drooped and pined-then broke at last. Far away the Exile's mosning, Bent the stillness of theair,

Words of patient, earnest longing, From his parched lips rose in prayer. 'Saviour! helper of the friendless, Thou whose bleed for me was shed, Close beside me watch I pray Thee, Bless my lonely, dying bed, Thou whose love did'st ne'er forsake me, Though so oft I've gone astray;

Just so oft Thy hand has gently Led me in the parrow way. Bless my gentle, stricken Nita, Heal her bleeding, faithful heart. And O Savier, in Thy kingdom Give us each a little part.

In Thy fold I pray Thee gather,

Those who weep my swift decay,

Meckly may they bow in sorrow. To Thy will -- and wait and pray. Then was hushed the Exile's longing, Ceased his every wish to roam. With the pure, the blest, the pardoned, He had found at last a home.
